I chose oil painting as my first medium because I wanted to use thick, blended colors to show a lot of emotion. Oil paint is great for layering and creating a messy, but deep texture that makes the businessmen in the paintings look human and a bit stressed. However when I switched to silkscreen print making, the image qualities changed. All the soft, blended skin tones and brush strokes disappeared. They were replaced at flat blocks of colors.

Each medium communicates something different. The oil painting feels like a personal, moody look into someone's mind. But the silkscreen version looks more like a political poster or a logo.
A major limitation I found in print making was that the AI couldn't mix the colors like it did with the oil painting. The print making image had to be cut into single shades, but I did discover that seeing how the high contrast made the businessmen face and arms look more solid.
Tools like the stencil and squeegee, made the man look more intimidating. Overall, in the oil in looked like the dude was having a tough day, but in the silkscreen one he looks like he has control.
